I started the process by downloading Adobe Photoshop cs6 . It is obvious that the interface is cleaner, the quality of work and performance is better, and the overall new structure is coherent. Of course, the quality of the learning curve is ever-present, but it has been reduced to a more acceptable level. The processing times have improved, but the memory usage has not substantially decreased. Gradients are not as smooth and accurate as they should be, but it is still better than it was in previous versions. I don't have any problems with layer effects that I encountered in the previous versions, but the overall level of quality is not up to par. This is a minor complaint, but it tips the scale in the negative column. I like the fact that you are given the option to adjust the contrast level, saturation level, and shadows. This increases the quality of the graphics, but does not allow to over-saturate. And the shadows and reflections are by far the most important problems. If there is a software with a little more work time, they would be fine. Otherwise, keep in mind that I keep editing the photos in the RAW converter, which has some amazing abilities. I just wish that a RAW conversion in Photoshop was possible. I did not find it. I only encountered problems with a synchronization of the layers. What is better than Photoshop? Can you imagine? It is like a pimped up version of the basic camera, maybe even with a flashlight, a way to control the author's English and French language, a built-in book, an apple slice.
