What's new:

- Tutorial You have 3 text fields in your product line. One for a short text name, one which contains some more description text, and a third one for a description full of long sentences. Well, as it turns out, you can also create an EditorWindow from it. You need to know what's happening in this tiny window, so we recommend reading the following article: EditorWindow: The Beginners Guide. So here's how it is basically done: Where to begin? What's the purpose of this EditorWindow? First of all, it provides methods to edit your product line immediately without you having to open MP... How do I use this EditorWindow? Well, you can use the EditorWindow.Open() method to open the editor. At first, you'd add the EditorWindow.Open() from the line that's calling your Update() method (in our case, the UpButton_Click() method of the ProductList form). At the end of the code that's calling Update(), you'll remove the EditorWindow.Open() again so that it doesn't stay open and continue to drain resources while the form is still open. Only for returning products?! What is GetLines() all about? This method returns an array of all the lines in a block of text. The first line is the ID of the first line and the following lines are the next ones in line with the ID of the previous line... The GetLine method takes the character type of the first line. If the first line is a sentence, you get a string of all letters. In that case, you get all the text until the next newline. Otherwise you get all the text until the first place where the second line starts. And the GetLine() method is used only for returning text from the text fields. Since you only use these fields for displaying pretty texts, you don't need to display the lines in a list. You don't want it to look like it would be looked at by a human, right? Just handle the line array and print the first line as a special item. That's it! How do I do it? Update() method Update() manages all the text for you. Since it's a line of code, it's pretty much straight forward. Besides Text which holds the name

The effect of fentanyl and isoflurane on shear stress-induced platelet activation in dogs. The effects of fentanyl and isoflurane anesthesia on shear stress-induced platelet activation in dogs were studied. Sixteen healthy mongrel dogs, average weight of 10.9 kg, were assigned to four groups. Dorsal metacarpal artery blood flow was measured by a Doppler flowmeter. After dorsal metacarpal artery blood flow was maintained at 40 ml/min for 60 min, shear stress was applied as a decrease in blood flow of more than 30% from baseline. Anesthesia was maintained with fentanyl (1.0 microgram.kg-1.min-1) or isoflurane (1.0%) in oxygen. Platelet-rich plasma was prepared by centrifugation of arterial blood and flow cytometry used to detect platelet expression of P-selectin. The number of adherent platelets and platelet P-selectin expression increased with shear stress in all dogs. In group I (fentanyl, no anesthetics), flow decreased from a mean (+/-SD) of 82.9% +/- 4.4% to 38.1% +/- 9.6% of baseline, and both the number of adherent platelets and platelet P-selectin expression increased. In group II (isoflurane, fentanyl), flow decreased from a mean (+/-SD) of 83.2% +/- 4.4% to 33.8% +/- 12.6% of baseline, and both the number of adherent platelets and platelet P-selectin expression increased. In group

III (fentanyl, isoflurane), flow decreased from a mean (+/-SD) of 87.6% +/- 4.0% to 31.5% +/- 11.7% of baseline, and both the number of adherent platelets and platelet P-selectin expression increased. In
