The best tools are able to fix registry problems and optimize it.'Moderate' to 'severe' depression screening and early detection in primary care. Depression screening rates in primary care have increased from 21% in the 1960s to 55% in the 1990s; however, no attempts have been made to collect data on the quality of depression screening and early detection. A regional New Zealand health service surveyed all general practices in the region to assess their screening practices and to determine the proportions of patients who screened 'moderately or severely' depressed. An audit of all depression-related health clinic notes was also undertaken. Twenty-one practices were surveyed with 1217 patients and 669 of these patients screened for depression. Of the practices, 65% diagnosed patients as being moderately or severely depressed and of these, 25% were referred for additional intervention. The regional audit found that the prevalence of depression was high in this sample and that a majority of patients with depression were undiagnosed. Ninety-five (17%) patients were referred for depression-related consultation, but only 48 (50%) patients attended a health clinic appointment. Improvement in depression screening rates in primary care requires improved uptake of a screening tool, increased uptake of referral from general practice to mental health clinics and improved access to a subsequent health clinic appointment.
