For instance, I found a local pawn shop selling used World War II equipment such as radios, walkie-talkies and machine guns. But the customers are still using the radios they bought in the '60s to communicate with neighbours and relatives in other First Nations communities. The community is just south of the Michigan-Wisconsin border, 20 minutes north of Sault Ste. Marie. One shop owner, who didn't want to be identified, was selling walkie-talkies to the tune of about $60. Also, the community's two general stores, one carrying groceries and another selling cigarettes, continue to operate, despite the fact that people in neighbouring cities such as Michigan City, Mishawaka and Hammond, Ind., can get such products in the nearest big city. This close-knit community of about 6,000 people is well known for the residents' staunch opposition to the Enbridge Line 5 pipeline from the Canadian province of Alberta to the Ontario city of Superior. Many residents see Line 5 as an environmental hazard that would pollute the Nith River and waterways downstream. Environmental activists such as FASN (Friends Against the Line 5) and the Nith River Coalition have been fighting the proposed $2.5-billion pipeline since 2010. Last November, the Federal Court of Appeal sided with the community, ruling that the Canadian government did not properly assess the project's impacts, and ordered a full environmental impact statement, with further hearings scheduled for the summer of 2017. Story continues below advertisement The process is ongoing. As for the environment, the group is fighting two pipelines in Michigan. One runs from New Jersey to Ontario and the other runs from New York to the Canadian province of Quebec, both of which are several years away from construction. The Michigan Public
