The new Adobe Search feature is slick. It pulls in the familiar search bar, but also checks recently used keywords. Before searching for specific terms, you can also filter results by Ratings, tags, stars, date created and time. Also, it will still search Adobe Stock, Flickr and Google Images, but you can also narrow your search to pictures from specific companies or users. Also, it's no longer restricted to what Adobe Creative Cloud users can see. Search results are listed in a separate panel. The improved fuzzy-finder in the new Lightroom 8 can be slightly uncomfortable; it feels as if you're selecting a white patch in a photo rather than a face. I'd like to be able to use it on a model's eyes, for example, but it just didn't work for that purpose. Dodge and Burn no longer create an Amoeba effect. I could be wrong, but I don't think they did anything very different than Lightroom used to do. I'm not sure why they made it optional, though. Ascending and Descending Modes are now labeled on any desaturation slider. Another big change is that most filters will now add the filter, rather than replace/erase the one in the original image. Performances will, of course, be different. But these changes should make the more powerful filters much more useful. For example, the Dodge & Burn effect has been updated in this release to take control of the original image instead of simply applying a white patch. Productivity has been improved to the point where it hardly seems to matter which software you first are prompted to buy. Reviews note that the key new feature for Photoshop is the ability to create layers from one another with copy and paste. I wouldn't read a great deal into this functionality. It's not really that you can't create layers this way before, it's just that Photoshop now provides you with the capabilities of layer-making with automatic or manual operation.

If Apple manages to create a Mac in the vein of the iPhone, Apple's new Mac Pro before the fall of 2018 will be the replacement for the previous Mac Pro. The company will also be introducing a new iMac since the desktop computer has been on Adobe's radar for a long time. Apple's strategy is to make improvements to the software and hardware, and better support the creative software. The top-of-the-line Quadro silicon will be the Nvidia Tesla V100. This is an all new kind of graphic processing unit, that includes a couple of full AI engines. It's also got the capacity to do thousands of neural operations per second. Combining these two, it means that a computer can do a million times more operations than processors that come from the time when film had been replaced by digital exposure. With that kind of power, the new AI is capable of retouching pictures or doing the whole compositing in a single step. And that's just one example. The use of AI in Photoshop brings many new innovations to the table. Most of the existing operations have incorporated AI since the introduction of Photoshop. With AI's expanded capabilities, and the overall performance, everybody will be able to use it to better their craft. In the past, most of the benefits of the AI were seen only in the most complicated operations. This is because most of the computers were employed just in the process. With the recent increase in vertical Integrated Graphics Processing Units (or V-ID for short) of graphic processing units with multiple processing units in the same physical space, the roles of the computer have changed; we have the capability to divide up and distribute the tasks among the computers. Hence, the computer turns into a task orchestrator without any of the tasks being done by a single computer.
